

Painting by J. H. Moser in the U. S. National Museum

"The Still Hunt" was painted when countless herds of buffalo roamed the Great Plains organized bands of buffalo hunters who sold hides for one dollar each. These professional hunters were themselves amazed when the supply began to run out. They believed that "the great herd" had gone north or that it was following some other route, when the fact was that the buffalo had fallen before the deadly guns of the hunters. We hear the same story today from the duck hunters, who, finding a scarcity of game, try hard to believe that the ducks are following some other route southward, and are reluctant to admit that they are responsible for the scarcity of ducks. "Pioneer Book"

BUFFALO HUNT, BY J. T. HARWOOD